SHALL WE READ?

This week, an early-morning earthquake in Tibet of magnitude 7.1 and originating at a depth of 10 km has reportedly claimed at least 100 lives and damaged buildings and houses. The tremors from the quake were felt in Nepal as well as parts of Bihar and even New Delhi, thousands of kilometres away. The main earthquake was followed by at least two aftershocks. If the epicentre had been located closer to India, the damage could have been manifold. Earthquakes in the Himalayas evoke a special kind of dread in the country. Memories of two deadly quakes in Nepal in April and May of 2015 that killed at least 9,000 and caused incalculable damage still bubble up.

xxx

The tectonic plates are the gigantic shards into which Earth is broken up. Layered on them are the continents and the seas. These plates are constantly in motion — colliding with, diverging with, or sliding past one another. The Indian plate collided with the Eurasian plate and the crust tilted upwards, creating the Himalayas. The fractured zones along which they interact create the fault lines where earthquakes occur. By studying these faults and the pattern of past earthquakes, seismologists can estimate how much latent energy at these fault lines, which can run thousands of miles, has been released and how much of it still resides in them.

xxx

Scientists have long warned of a massive, overdue earthquake in the Garhwal-Kumaon range because of what is known about the pattern of quakes in the region. The records of the last 300 years suggest that those that have occurred have not released all the pent-up energy and that is why there is a broad consensus among experts that an 8-magnitude temblor is overdue. Unfortunately, predicting the day and time is outside the ambit of current science. Thus, the best we can hope for is insulation against the projected damage. It is in this context that infrastructure development in the Himalayan region must be viewed.

xxx

While several of these projects are intended to smooth the movement of people and goods, the recurrent landslides and glacial lake outbursts that wash away dams, hydropower projects, and roads serve as a constant reminder of the inherent fragility of the region. Every form of infrastructure in the region — power plant or dam — must take into account the imminence of a major earthquake and the associated costs factored into planning. Adhering to already existing building codes, not only in the Himalayas but in the surrounding Indo-Gangetic plains, can go a long way in limiting the inevitable damage.

xxx

The present human condition is marked by a loss of faith in the permanence of the world. The continuing violence in several places, climate change and ecological crises are chipping away at the assuredness in the sheer presence of the world. What is the nature of pain we encounter in the face of this transitory world? The human condition is characterised by a distinct sense of haphazardness towards this predicament — we seem to be assured of our ability to bandage injuries. Under the moral injunction to act, we take recourse to hasty, unexamined actions, which are sometimes more band-aid than salve.

xxx

The call to act in the face of crisis is high enough to foreclose a patient understanding of concerns that demand time. This seems to remove empathy from our understanding of the state of affairs. Hannah Arendt's account of human action is prescient in this respect. Human beings indeed are blessed with this unique capacity to act and bring something new to the world. However, paradoxically, these actions can become self-defeating, as they can set off a chain of events, which are not only beyond their own control but can also result in self-inflicted catastrophes. The unintended effects of human action, as history has shown, have resulted in unprecedented devastation.

xxx

At the same time, Arendt underlines the significance of common “human” experiences, especially with those whose perspectives may differ from ours. In recent years, the Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Zizek has warned against the anti-theoretical edge of urgent injunctions, finding value in patient learning and understanding of the problem at hand, instead of giving in to the impulse to act immediately. The crises are exploited by the state-market nexus. It feeds on our anxieties by propelling an urgency to act and save the world. Ironically, its other side is systematically involved in developing a thick immunity to this decaying world — bottled water, air purifiers, air conditioners, and gated communities.

xxx

A lot of technological solutions to ecological crises are not based on the connection between human beings and nature. Education has always been seen as directly or indirectly responsible for whatever is happening in the world and, therefore, is expected to develop an immediate response to this crisis. Consequently, awareness programmes seem to have received traction in recent times, especially with regard to ecological, social and cultural concerns. But how effective are these as “sensitisation” efforts? Imbuing education with a proactive action plan to avert or delay catastrophes has become the focus of policy and practice.

xxx

Education does have a role in mitigating or preventing crises. However, the ways in which unrealistic expectations are often placed on education should be of concern to us. Education is not expected to frame a well-thought-out response that ensues because of staying with the problem, reflecting and thinking about its contours and encountering the “affect” that it generates. Instead, it is handed the charge of fixing the problem with implementable, operational plans. Unwittingly, this fake urgency to act, even with the right intentions, only furthers the artificial divide that is often made between thinking, feeling and doing.

xxx

What does it then mean to inhabit the world whose permanence one is not sure of? What is the nature of pain we encounter as we become cognisant of this decaying world? In a brilliant three-page essay, 'On Transience', Freud engages with humans' inability to experience joy or the capacity to love in the face of impending decay. The fact that the loved object will go away, and is transitory, disturbs the worth of that object. For Freud, mourning helps one reconcile with the loss and recalibrate oneself with the changing times

SUMMARY

This editorial reflects on the challenges of living in a world where permanence seems uncertain due to ongoing crises such as violence, climate change, and ecological degradation. It examines how human reactions to these problems often prioritize immediate action over thoughtful understanding, which can sometimes worsen the issues.

xxx

KEY IDEAS:

1. Human Reaction to Crises:

- o We tend to respond to crises hastily, acting out of moral pressure without fully analyzing the situation. Such "band-aid" solutions may temporarily cover the problem but fail to address the root causes.
- o Philosopher Hannah Arendt highlights that while humans have the unique ability to act and create change, these actions can have unintended, often harmful, consequences.

KEY IDEAS:

2. Need for Patience and Empathy:

- o Slavoj Žižek warns against rushing to act without understanding the complexity of the problem. Instead, he advocates for patient learning and empathy.
- o The lack of empathy and the tendency to act impulsively strip humanity of meaningful connections and nuanced understanding of crises.

KEY IDEAS:

3. Role of the State-Market Nexus:

- o The state and market exploit our fears by pushing urgent actions to "save the world." However, they simultaneously create systems that cater to the privileged, like bottled water and gated communities, rather than addressing the root causes of ecological problems.
- o Technological fixes often ignore the deeper relationship between humans and nature, offering short-term relief rather than sustainable solutions.

KEY IDEAS:

4. Education's Role and Limitations:

- o Education is often tasked with solving global crises through awareness programs and proactive policies. While it has an important role, unrealistic expectations can hinder its effectiveness.
- o A meaningful response requires time for reflection, thought, and an emotional connection to the problem, but education is pressured to deliver quick, operational fixes.

KEY IDEAS:

5. Coping with a Decaying World:

- o Sigmund Freud's essay On Transience is referenced to explore how humans struggle to find joy or love when aware of the world's impermanence. Mourning, according to Freud, helps us come to terms with loss and adapt to change.

CONCLUSION:

The editorial emphasizes the importance of moving beyond rushed solutions to develop a deeper understanding of crises. It calls for combining thinking, feeling, and action to create lasting change, rather than succumbing to fake urgencies driven by fear or pressure. It reminds us to reconcile with the transitory nature of the world and approach problems with patience, empathy, and thoughtful engagement.
