SHALL WE READ?

The Supreme Court of India's ruling that there can be no reservation based on residence in admission to PG medical courses is consistent with the constitutional mandate of equality before law, but may adversely affect the priorities and health-care requirements of the States. The Court has reminded everyone that there is only one 'domicile' for Indians, and that the right to seek admissions anywhere in the country must be open to residents of all States.

This is in line with a series of verdicts on the question whether there can be admissions based on institutional preference or residential requirements. The view is that institutional preference, that is choosing candidates who had passed out of an institution for admission to PG courses in the same institution, is constitutionally permissible; and that admission to UG medical courses can have a residential requirement, primarily because the basic medical needs of a region can be better addressed by admitting more people from the same background so that doctors emerging from the system would render public service there. However, on the principle that higher qualifications brook no compromise with merit, the prevailing view is that PG courses should not be open for any such residential preference, as the need to attract the best talent is higher.

xxx

Many States do fill up PG seats in government medical colleges, and seats available to them in private colleges, barring those that are filled on an all-India basis, with candidates drawn from their own States. Candidates from other States can enter PG medical courses in a State only through the national quota. This system, now impermissible, has its own justification, as PG students form the backbone of medical services in government hospitals. In addition, such students have the additional incentive of joining government service and, thereby, acquiring eligibility to apply for PG courses as 'service candidates'.

The southern States, in particular, have invested heavily in medical education, establishing a college in almost every district. These would like to accommodate more candidates from their States to keep their medical services going and with an eye on future manpower needs. It is expected that aggrieved States may seek a review of this judgment. It is likely that the verdict will result in the Union government finding one more way to restrict the role of the States in medical admissions. Interestingly, the distinction the Court has made between PG and UG courses when it comes to prioritising local needs may be a sound argument in itself for questioning the continuing tendency to centralise even UG admissions across streams. The solution lies in creating educational infrastructure of near-uniform quality in every district.

Q1. What is the primary reason the Supreme Court of India ruled against residence-based reservations in PG medical admissions?

- A) To prevent States from setting their own admission policies
- B) To ensure uniform medical education quality across all States result
- C) To uphold the constitutional principle of equality before the law
- D) To encourage students to serve in their home States
- E) To reduce the number of government medical seats in PG courses

Q2. What is the key difference between UG and PG medical admissions according to the court's ruling?

- A) UG admissions can prioritize local candidates, but PG admissions must focus on merit ← domicile
- B) Both UG and PG admissions must follow national quota rules
- C) UG admissions are open to all, while PG admissions require institutional preference
- D) PG admissions consider residential requirements, but UG admissions do not
- E) Both UG and PG admissions prioritize service candidates over other applicants

Q3. Why do States prefer to admit more candidates from within their own borders for PG medical courses?)

- A) To ensure medical graduates contribute to their local healthcare systems ←
- B) To increase competition among local students
- C) To limit the number of students from other States
- D) To comply with central government policies
- E) To prevent students from moving abroad after graduation

Q4. What concern does the article express about the centralization of medical admissions?

- A) It may lead to a decline in the quality of education
- B) It might reduce the autonomy of States in managing medical education ←
- C) It discourages students from pursuing medical education
- D) It forces students to move to other States for higher studies
- E) It increases competition unfairly among students from different backgrounds
