In recent months, global working norms have experienced a dramatic transformation—though the (A) of this shift remains debatable. The onset of the COVID-19 pandemic compelled millions to pivot abruptly to remote work, converting domestic spaces into makeshift offices and rendering platforms like Zoom and Microsoft Teams (B). While this transition has been largely effective, organizations worldwide are now (C) the sustainability and desirability of continued digital operations. At the University of Exeter, senior professionals are actively grappling with this dilemma. Remote work has yielded several advantages: increased flexibility has (D) caregivers and parents, the elimination of daily commutes has saved both time and money, and a noticeable improvement in air quality has been observed due to reduced travel. Many also report enhanced productivity and mental well-being—one executive recounted how a two-day business trip for a short meeting was replaced by a two-hour virtual call, allowing for more efficient use of time. However, this model is not universally accommodating. Some employees suffer from inadequate digital infrastructure, while others, especially extroverted individuals, struggle with social isolation. Leaders and managers have found themselves adopting more emotionally supportive roles, focusing less on performance metrics and more on psychological welfare. This (E) dynamic has redefined traditional leadership responsibilities. As organizations weigh the future of workplace structures, they must consider a (F) balance between efficiency, human connection, and adaptability in an increasingly digitized world.
