SHALL WE READ?

In the heart of Bengaluru, software developers find themselves racing against time to outbid Chinese rivals for major Artificial Intelligence (AI)-driven projects with international clients. Despite being part of a skilled workforce, deals often slip away due to capabilities Indian firms struggle to match. This is not just a single developer's dilemma. It is a glimpse into India's crossroads. Faced with a three-way race to catch up with Silicon Valley while being chased by China and South East Asia, India is being subject to rigorous competition. But, if it wants to prevail at the forefront of the AI race, India must recognise that the challenge lies not in whether businesses prefer a local or foreign AI platform but in whether market regulations will inadvertently stifle India's momentum.

Export competitiveness hinges on the nationwide deployment of productivity-enhancing technologies. Indian services and consultancies must incorporate AI technologies to maintain their lead position in the global market. But concerns remain over the massive loss of routine jobs, discriminatory algorithmic decision-making, and the negative risks of human impersonation. In particular, "deepfakes" undermine trust by spreading misinformation, and destabilise political processes eroding credibility rapidly.

AI adoption issues such as misinformation and intermediary liability are at the forefront of the AI discussion in India, as digital platforms have become primary conduits for information dissemination. The general opinion among startups in India is that intermediaries — usually foreign tech giants — often set the rules of engagement, making it challenging for local startups to compete.

Tension has increased since, with recent Indian app developers filing a complaint against Google before the Competition Commission of India. But, putting regulatory and administrative pressure on those companies will not necessarily resolve the core problem of monopolistic business practices. India has already localised a significant portion of the AI value chain, and additional AI-related compliance costs may hamper India's ability to outpace commercial rivals such as China and the United States, which have decided to leave AI unregulated
